

Fractured Echoes

Moral/Philosophical Sci-Fi

After The Hormonal Plague wipes out ninety percent of women, the world collapses into scarcity, violence, and a desperate race for survival. With no natural way to restore balance, humanity turns to the one technology powerful enough to rewrite its fate: time travel.

The Temporal Retrieval Initiative begins as a humanitarian effort, rescuing women throughout history at the moment before their deaths. But the mission quickly mutates. What was meant to save civilization becomes a profitable machine built on ownership, coercion, and the quiet reconstruction of society in the image of those who control the timeline.

Shatner Barnes, a gifted but disillusioned retrieval agent, uncovers the truth that destroys everything he believed in. His director, Ramses, sabotaged his mission to erase him from the timeline and seize full control of the program. Ramses' ultimate goal is to let the elite rewrite humanity by claiming women from the past as assets, partners, or currency in a rebuilt future.

Reed, once a moral colleague and friend, made a devastating bargain. To save his wife and child from a fatal accident, he traded their lives for a future shaped by Ramses' authoritarian vision. His choice fractures the timeline and shifts the world toward a dangerous new order.

When a figure from a rogue timeline returns, Shatner's closest friend, aged, altered, and carrying memories Shatner never lived, they bring the truth of what the future becomes if Ramses succeeds. They also bring a second chance.

Armed with forbidden knowledge and hunted by the very agency he once served, Shatner must challenge the future itself. To stop Ramses and undo Reed's desperate manipulation, he will have to break the rules of time, confront versions of the world that should never exist, and risk unraveling the past that still holds the people he loves.

In a reality where history can be harvested and the future is for sale, Shatner faces an impossible question.

How far can one man go to repair what was stolen without becoming the architect of another broken world?
